PREFACE

It may not be out of place to sketch briefly the history of the Journal of Philology, an index to which is here for the first time issued, and to explain why it appears under the auspices, and at the expense, of the Cambridge Classical Society.

In 1868 the Journal of Philology was founded by leading Cambridge scholars, and the first number appeared in the same year. The first seven volumes were edited by Mr W. G. Clark, Public Orator, Mr J. E. B. Mayor, later Professor of Latin, and Mr W. Aldis Wright, later Vice-Master of Trinity College. In 1874 Mr Clark resigned through ill-health, and Mr Mayor, finding himself too much occupied with other work, also retired. Mr Aldis Wright, however, continued the work, in association with Mr Ingram Bywater, later Regius Professor of Greek at Oxford, and Mr Henry Jackson, later Regius Professor of Greek[1].

The Journal was, and remained to the end, the property of its publishers, Messrs Macmillan, and was printed for them at the Cambridge University Press.

In 1872 the Cambridge Philological Society, which this year celebrates its jubilee, was founded by the energy of Mr (later Sir) R. C. Jebb, Public Orator and later Regius Professor of Greek, and of Mr E. B. Cowell, Professor of Sanskrit: the former being the first Secretary, the latter the first President. On Oct. 17th in the same year, the Council of the Society resolved "that until further notice a copy of each future number of the Journal of Philology be sent to every member of the Cambridge Philological Society whose subscription is not in arrear." Henceforward the Journal chiefly depended for its existence on the Cambridge Philological Society, but the latter had no control over the Journal, and simply purchased at a reduced price from Messrs Macmillan copies of it for its members. Two numbers, making one volume, appeared each year, and for a long time these were issued with tolerable regularity. As the volumes multiplied, scholars complained of the lack of an index, and with the lapse of time the grievance grew, as a student might have to search through a score of volumes before finding the paper of which he was in quest. As the Cambridge Philological Society was the chief supporter of the Journal, not unnaturally its members thought themselves justified in making representations to the editors and publishers, and it was more than once proposed that the Society should undertake the cost of making an index to the Journal for the benefit of its members. But nothing was done.

Meantime the issue of the Journal became more and more irregular, often one part only appearing in a year and not always even that. But as the Journal was the chief return that the non-resident members of the Philological Society received for their guinea subscriptions, not a few of these from time to time expressed their feelings in no uncertain terms to the officers of the Society. The latter could only make the unsatisfactory reply that the Society had no control over the editors and publishers of the Journal, and resignations ensued from time to time.

When the War came, Messrs Macmillan raised the price of each number to the Society to eight shillings. Now, if things were normal, and two numbers were issued each year, their cost would have absorbed nearly the full subscription of each member, and little would have been left for the publication of Proceedings and Transactions, and for grants in aid of research. Owing to the irregularity of the issue of the Journal, as already mentioned, there had been for some time a feeling in the Society that it would be better to supply its members with the Classical Quarterly, which appears with laudable punctuality and which covers much of the same field as the Journal. Accordingly the Society (Feb. 24th, 1921) agreed to notify Messrs Macmillan that it would cease to purchase copies of the Journal after the appearance of its next number—the 70th—which would complete Vol. XXXV. This last number appeared under the date 1920, and with it, to the regret of many, ceased the publication of that Journal which for more than half a century had performed such signal service to Classical learning.

The time then seemed to have come when a proper index to the whole thirty-five volumes of the Journal should be published, in order that its great stores of learning might be rescued from oblivion and made accessible to scholars. The Cambridge Philological Society, which had so long been the mainstay of the Journal, would have been the proper body to carry out a work which it had so often contemplated. But as it had helped with liberal grants to keep alive the Classical Review and the Classical Quarterly during the evil days of war, it had no money available for the cost of such an Index. On the other hand, its younger sister, the Cambridge Classical Society, had a considerable sum at its disposal, and as its members form about 80 per cent. of the Philological Society, the Committee of the former with the hearty approval of its sister body proposed to devote a portion of its funds to the preparation and publication of a proper Index. The first step was to ask Messrs Macmillan whether they intended to crown the fine series of the Journal with an index volume. But Mr George A. Macmillan replied in the negative, at the same time intimating that his firm had no objection to such a work being done by others. The Committee at once secured the services of Miss W. M. L. Hutchinson, well known for her admirable indexing of the Classical Review and of the Classical Quarterly. The Cambridge University Press kindly undertook the printing and issuing of the Index here presented to scholars.
